

The mystery of solid gasoline

Uninflammable that cuts down costs by 50%.

Something that I use to do before reading a book is to lay my thumb on the right edge of the book and let the pages flow quickly in my hands. "The mystery of solid gasoline", half of the book is composed of original documents.

The case of solid gasoline "a real mystery to handle with care."

You don't have to talk about it...that's the way the book presents itself.

Truth, as a Greek philosopher used to say, often need a disguise to be credible, therefore all we can do is to look for help from fantasy that sometimes exceeds the reality itself.

This preamble gives an interesting and particular approach to the book, tale and original documents, paradox that turns along the way into reality.

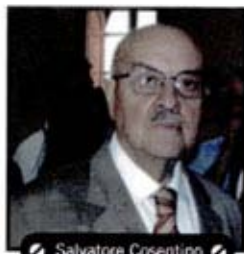

We are in Erbita at the end of the story, and from here starts the tale of the inventor of the uninflammable fuel, Gaetano Fuardo from Piazza Armerina.

The solid gasoline floats on the water, so it can't pollute the sea, being not inflammable it can avert the risk of fires on every mean of transport, it threatens to make oil tankers and gas station disappear, cuts down costs by 50%. We don't have to talk about it... Change frightens, change disturbs, this change threatens.

Fuardo, chemical engineer, makes this sensational discovery that takes him, after Italy, to Germany, Great Britain and France, everyone is interested, the big companies are involved in Fuardo and his solid gasoline, but at the end all stops, or better "vanishes". All is left is Fuardo, his trademark and the sentence by a French Court that makes official his discovery and its commercial value, even if it's too late because his maker died in misery and desperation.

We don't have to talk about it... Silence, silence, why? Who can explain why international powers blocked the due information to the world of this great discovery? Who can explain why this mysterious story at some point is tinged with death and blood?

"The public opinion should require right now a clear answer, not allowing mafia strategies and intrigues to hide the truth" Knowledge is freedom, action and truth, the world asks for knowledge. ■
